Speaker of the House of Representatives.

*Vice President of the United States and

RECOMMENDED SIGNING STATEMENT

I am pleased today to sign into law the Intelligence Authorization Act of 1985. With the exception of one provision, this Act represents another step in my continuing effort to revitalize our Nation's intelligence capability. Given the ever increasing difficulty of ensuring the security of this Nation, it is essential that we have an Intelligence Community capable of meeting these diverse challenges. In authorizing sufficient appropriations and in providing new administrative authorities that enhance the ability of our intelligence agencies to perform their missions, Congress has, with this Act, provided the basis for maintaining and building our intelligence capabilities. I must state my disappointment, however, with the Act's placement of undue restrictions on this country's ability to support the democratic resistance forces in Nicaragua, which unilaterally removes for five months the single most effective instrument of pressure available to moderate Sandinista behavior. On the whole, however, this Act ensures that the Intelligence Community can continue to stay firmly on the path of progress which we and the Congress have charted together.
